made.

"It is as safe as they can make it," Khabbaza said.

In addition to spacing and sanitizing, he said face masks add an extra layer of protection from the virus. Most U.S. carriers now require passengers to wear them.

Trains and buses

Surface transportation presents similar challenges to those in aviation, Khabbaza said.

"Distancing isn't always possible to the extent you'd like," he said. "That's not going to go away as long as the virus is around."

Like the airlines, Amtrak and intercity bus operators like Greyhound and Peter Pan Line are requiring passengers to wear face masks. They're promoting physical distancing when possible and cleaning and disinfecting high-touch surfaces more often.

Cruise ships

Though cruise ships were some of the original hot spots for the coronavirus, Khabbaza said when they resume sailing, their risk will be lower with precautions cruise companies are putting in place, as long as passengers and crew members adhere to them.

"It involves buy-in from everyone," he said.

The Cleveland Clinic has been helping United Airlines develop its coronavirus mitigation policies, including mandatory face masks, touchless kiosks and physical distancing.

Cruise ship passengers can stay separate from other groups on the ship by staying in their own rooms. Common areas of the ship offer space for distancing, and outdoor activities are inherently less risky for disease transmission, Khabbaza said.

The elimination of buffet food service, a move under consideration by multiple cruise lines, would remove a point of potential transmission not only for the coronavirus, but also for the food-borne illnesses that have long plagued cruise ship operations, Khabbaza noted.

Theme parks

As some of the nation's larger theme parks reopen, such as those run by Universal and Disney, Khabbaza said the biggest risk may come from the travel it takes to reach them. The coronavirus is having a different impact across the country, with some states seeing a decline in infections and others an increase.

Otherwise, he said theme parks are at the safer end of the spectrum. Why? Theme parks are universally implementing changes that include social distancing, mandatory face masks, the increased availability of hand sanitizer and the increased disinfection of high-contact surfaces.

Theme parks are also mostly outdoors, posing a lower risk than enclosed spaces. They're also limiting the number of visitors who can enter.

Road trips

Khabbaza said to take precautions every time you step out of the car, whether for gas, food or a rest break.

He recommends using hand sanitizer every time you pump gas, and resist the temptation to use your phone while you're doing it.

"Even locally, that's a very important practice," he said.

With adults or older children, Khabbaza said it should be safe to visit convenience stores and sit down to eat.

"If you're traveling with young kids, that changes it a bit," he said. "Kids run around and touch stuff."

With younger kids, he said take them to the restroom and then back to the car to eat. That minimizes their exposure to surfaces and items where infected droplets may have fallen.

Hotels

Hotels have increased their cleaning and disinfecting procedures for high-touch surfaces and common areas, as well as encouraged physical distancing.

They've encouraged on-line check-in and automatic checkout to eliminate face-to-face interactions. They've sealed items in rooms, such as coffee cups and glassware, and have eliminated mini-bars.

Khabbaza said it's not a bad idea to bring your own disinfectant wipes to use on surfaces in the room.

The risk of coronavirus from housekeeping should be relatively low he said, though housekeeping staff are going from room to room.

"If they carry the virus, potentially the risk is they could bring it to your room," he said.

Camping

Camping is probably the safest activity, Khabbaza said. It's outdoors, and you're likely to stay with your own family or social group. Some campgrounds remain closed, though, including those in national parks. Check before you go.
