ca has had students with different skill sets looking to develop the functional skills of Filipino martial arts. “I’ve trained people from all walks of life ranging from military personnel on and off-base, members of law enforcement and everyday people who want to learn how to defend themselves using various tools and such,” he said.

He recently expanded the classes to include children, however, he does have one rule when it comes to teaching kids, “at least one parent has to be present during training sessions.” If possible, Navasca takes the opportunity to invite the parents to participate in the training sessions.

‘Ignite a flame’

Despite his years practicing the techniques, Navasca remains humble as he represents a part of the Filipino culture. “Teaching FMA allows me to continue training in the art through propagation. Even though I teach, I still consider myself a student who just happened to have studied for 10 years,” Navasca said. “It also allows me to spread the culture and the lesser-known history of Filipinos told through FMA.”

He pointed out that unlike other tactical sports, like Brazilian jiu-jitsu or judo, the island has yet to have Filipino martial arts as a regularly practiced sport.

“Guam, even though with a fairly sizable Filipino community, doesn’t have a strong interest in FMA,” Navasca said. “Other countries and also the U.S., have FMA exponentially growing and it’s only going to expand even more. I’m hoping that I and other FMA practitioners can ignite a flame here on Guam to bring the art out of secrecy.”

Navasca plans to rebuild the practice of Filipino martial arts on island by first reviving the Filipino martial arts club at the University of Guam. He also wants to raise awareness among his fellow kababayans, “friends” in English, that even Filipinos have their own martial arts that they could practice and be proud to study and defend themselves with.

He also hopes to take his skills to several competitions like the Arnis competitions of the Southeast Asian Games. With enough fire in him, Navasca wants to hold his own competitions on island. “Yes, I’m looking to one day start a tournament here on Guam, even if it’s just exhibition to show the different systems and styles in FMA,” he said.

Those interested in learning Filipino martial arts may contact Navasca at cadenilla.eskrima.group.guam@gmail.com.

Navasca leaves those interested in FMA with one point of advice: “You’ll never know how far you’ll go if you don’t take the first step out of your comfort zone. This is exactly what happened to me 10 years ago.”
