

Iran nuclear talks resume on upbeat note

VIENNA (Reuters) – EU, Iranian and Russian diplomats sounded upbeat as Iran and world powers held their first talks in five months on Monday to try to save their 2015 nuclear deal, despite Tehran taking a tough stance in public that Western powers said would not work.

Diplomats say time is running out to resurrect the pact, which then-U.S. President Donald Trump abandoned in 2018 in a move that infuriated Iran and dismayed the other powers involved – Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia.

European Union, Iranian and Russian delegates to the talks offered optimistic assessments after the new round began with a session of the remaining parties to the deal, without the United States – whom Iran refuses to meet face-to-face.

"I feel extremely positive about what I have seen today," Enrique Mora, the EU official chairing the talks, said after the meeting – the seventh round of talks aimed at reviving a deal under which Iran limited its disputed uranium enrichment program in return for relief from U.S., EU and U.N. economic sanctions.

Mora told reporters the new Iranian delegation had stuck to its demand that all sanctions be lifted. But he also suggested Tehran had not rejected outright the results of the previous six rounds of talks held between April and June.

"They have accepted that the work done over the first six rounds is a good basis to build our work ahead," he said.

"We will be of course incorporating the new political sensibilities of the new Iranian administration."

Russia's envoy to the talks, Mikhail Ulyanov, said on Twitter they "started quite successfully." Asked he if was optimistic, Iran's top negotiator, Ali Bagheri Kani, told reporters: "Yes, I am."

Few details in Pentagon review on global posture

WASHINGTON (Reuters) – A nearly 10-month Pentagon review released on Monday provided few details on the future of the military's global posture but said that President Joe Biden's administration would make decisions by working with allies and looking at long-term objectives.

The review is an attempt to move away from how former President Donald Trump made major decisions that impacted the military and allies – often on Twitter and with little discussions within his own administration that caught officials by surprise.

The review called for improving U.S. military infrastructure in Guam and Australia, but declined to provide details on other potential moves.

During his tenure Trump announced that U.S. troops would be leaving Syria on several occasions and at one point ordered a large troop cut from Germany, which Biden reversed.

"We sought to reestablish a strategy-informed, coherent decision-making process," said a senior U.S. defense official, who briefed reporters on the condition of anonymity.

The review did not lead to any major changes in the distribution of U.S. troops around the world, the official said.

The official added that the review called for improving U.S. military infrastructure in Guam and Australia, but declined to provide details on other potential moves because the report has mostly been classified.

"On the Indo-Pacific, we're moving the needle a bit," Mara Karlin, a senior Pentagon official, told reporters.

Karlin said the review did not look at whether the military could fight two major conflicts at the same time or at the space, cyber or nuclear domain.

The Biden administration, much like Trump, has sought to focus efforts on moving away from the Middle East and focusing on countering China.
